

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

The airing of this so called documentary, however, while obviously not going to bring in advertising dollars, is being done to help George Bush get reelected. Obviously, if he is reelected, he continues to control the FCC and that benefits Sinclair, not to mention the tax breaks they will be sure to get.

Everyone keeps saying the airwaves belong to the people. How can that be so when a corporation can decide to use their license for blatant political propaganda.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. They show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
